To meet thy SELF in the future is what can provide the direction for your current success - that is what I call Purpose.

A purpose-driven life is one where you clearly see your direction, your place, and your point of reference. You envision yourself as a noble king, endowed with peace and patience, possessing the strength to destroy but choosing instead to paint a picture of bliss on golden fabric. This fabric is framed with golden borders, meticulously crafted with the elements of a masterpiece. To your side lies a golden book, closed, adorned with red rubies. Yet, your gaze remains fixed on your true self, the one holding the brush, actively painting the picture of your future.

Every so often, you find your attention drifting towards the golden book - a thick, ancient bundle with an ornate cover. You wonder about its contents, but your future self, strong and timeless, gently redirects your focus to the creation at hand. This is your true power: the ability to concentrate on the present creation. The past, though encased in a beautiful golden cover, is a closed chapter. It is a precious book placed in a corner, but it does not dictate your life's mission.

Your purpose is embodied in the picture being painted by your future self, the master artist. Initially, you perceive this painting as modest, perhaps insignificant. But as you concentrate on the painter, you realize that the only small part is your current state. The frame expands as wide as the universe, and the picture within it is outstanding and vast. This realization brings you immense joy as you comprehend your purpose: the restoration of the system that drives you.

The majestic figure stands before you, holding the brush. As you converse with him, you ponder who this regal being might be - adorned with a golden crown and clad in a royal robe. In your short-term perspective, you might think of him as an ancestor or a wise sage. However, with time, you come to understand that this majestic being is, in fact, you - your future self, the one you are destined to become. This realization affirms your desires and solidifies your purpose.

You are that royal subject, holding the brush. With your back turned to the distractions of the past, you are meant to face the magnificent, golden canvas and paint the picture of your desires, your pain, and the life you aspire to create. This is your mission: to take the brush in your hand and craft the life you envision. The future is vast and filled with potential, and you hold the power to shape it.

In the presence of your future self, you learn that your true strength lies not in revisiting the past but in creating the future. The golden book, with its locked pages, serves as a reminder of where you have been, but it is not the path you are to tread. Instead, your focus must remain on the expansive, vibrant canvas before you. Your future self, resplendent in royal attire, guides your hand as you paint, ensuring that each stroke contributes to the masterpiece of your life. Your purpose is clear, your vision is vast, and with each deliberate movement, you bring your destiny into being.

In this process, you understand that the journey of creation is ongoing. The golden frame continues to widen, the painting grows more intricate, and the joy of purpose fills your heart. The system you seek to restore is not just an external entity but an intrinsic part of your life's mission. You are both the artist and the artwork, the creator and the creation. Embrace this role, hold the brush with confidence, and let your purpose guide each stroke on the golden canvas of your life.
